Re: Animal testing

Thank you for your recent inquiry regarding Church & Dwight's animal testing policy. Please be assured that Church & Dwight Co., Inc. is fully committed to ensuring and protecting animal welfare. We use only materials already known to be safe. It is our policy not to test on animals, and we also request that suppliers not test any materials or products on animals, unless required by law or regulation.

We take a detailed and deliberate approach to evaluating our ingredients and products for potential toxic effects from expected sources of exposure. If there is a question about a potential toxic effect related to an ingredient, we would look for a substitute ingredient, or conduct testing using a validated alternative (i.e., non-animal) test method such as in vitro and clinical safety studies.

All products manufactured and distributed in the U.S. are subject to compliance with local, state and federal regulations which may require animal safety testing for certain ingredients and product categories. When necessary to conduct such tests to comply with law or regulation, we only select highly qualified contract research facilities that fully comply with animal welfare laws. Through these steps we ensure an environment that is free from distress, cruelty, abuse, and neglect and that is consistent with all applicable laws and industry guidelines.

Thank you, and I trust this information will facilitate the necessary outcomes.

Best regards,
